

“OVER THERE”

of visiting some of the interesting and historic old cities of England. Winchester, the most interesting city visited, was for over four hundred years the capital of England. Here, during the Roman invasion of England, Julius Cæsar camped with his famous Roman legions. Here on the wall of the historic old town hall is King Arthur's Round Table, which is a priceless and significant relic, suggestive of the legends, romances and adventures of the mythical king and his knights of chivalry. Here is also the oldest and most historic of the great English cathedrals.

These were days of first impressions, and what later was passed unnoticed riveted our attention at that time. At Southampton we saw for the first time Scottish and Australian soldiers, German prisoners of war and wounded soldiers.

Our trip to Southampton and rapid cruise across the English Channel was uneventful, but easily could have been otherwise, if we had run amuck one of the numerous German submarines infesting the channel waters at that time.

We steamed out of the harbor at Southampton just after sunset, August 13. A wonderful twilight gave an enchanting beauty to the towering cliffs along the shore, some of which were adorned with stately castles. In the quiet and beauty of this twilight it was hard for us to realize that we were in the danger zone of the
